JAMES S. GRIFFIN.

DEMOCRATS CONFUSED.

There is confusion in the headquarters of the Democratic Congressional Committee in Washington. The campaign has already opened in many of the States and the Committees on which to make the fight has not even decided upon the lines on which to make the fight. The present outlook is that every candidate will be left to choose his own ground and make his campaign in his own way, receiving little or no help from the committee.

The trouble is that since the free silver issue was eliminated from politics the Democratic party has stood for nothing except general opposition to Republican policies, and in the present campaign the leaders have not even been able to agree as to what they should oppose. Probably more of them are in favor of making war on protection than on anything else, but the entire country has prospered so wonderfully under the Dingley law that there are few if any localities where the old Democratic free trade arguments can attract voters.

Criticism of the Republican railroad rate law is barred by the fact that every Democrat in Congress, with the exception of the two States-rights Senators from Alabama, voted for it, and any fault finding with the attitude of the administration as to corporations generally would simply react upon the Democratic party as it would invite a contrast between the way, in which President Roosevelt is compelling obedience to the laws and the utter failure of the Democrats, when in power, to accomplish anything, either under the anti-trust act or the interstate commerce act.

While the Democratic leaders may ultimately have to submit to the dictation of their twice-defeated leader and advocate his strange mixture of socialism and imperialism in the demand for government ownership, they are not yet ready to do so. They are also fighting shy of the labor issue. An alliance with Mr. Gompers in some sections of the country looks very attractive to them, but the men in charge of the National committee are afraid to risk committing their party to the labor legislative programme for the opposition to organized labor is strongest in those states where the Democratic party is most firmly entrenched in power and where its leaders have the least sympathy for the Gompers movement.

Senator Elkins has been allotted his annual quota of garden and flower seeds and will be glad to send a package to those who will write him either at Elkins or at Washington asking for them.

Federal ownership is said to be Bryan's new idea. It may be new to him, but, by the way, did not Tom Watson, the Populist nominee for President last time, advocate that very idea? Is the idea not an old one with the Populists? And yet Bryan and his following have the impudence to say the Republicans stole ideas and policies. Has not the papers for years been full of municipal and government ownership? In the discussion of the possible results of municipal ownership has not government ownership been alluded to. The only new part of the idea seems to be that the States ought to own the short lines of railroads, those within the States, and, so far he advances no reason for this, except to appease the South on the Jim Crow car features.

Thomas Jefferson never said anything that we know of about government ownership of railroads, nor did Bryan until a few days ago, but since the latter has said it, the Democrats who believe in Bryan will now proceed to say it is a Jeffersonian principle. That is, some of them will, but from what we hear about it all of them are aroused over the matter to the extent of doubting seriously whether Bryan is any longer a living one. That utterance is burying himself so deep with his own party that he will likely never experience a political resurrection.

Riley's letter of acceptance gives the Democrats no encouragement. There is plainly crossed therein that he regards his case as hopeless and not worth his while to endeavor to win. He knows the case is hopeless and puts it up to the county organizations, that the blame for defeat may be theirs and not his.

Some of the Democratic papers seem to forget that T. S. Riley, nominee for congress on the Democratic ticket, belonged to the old regime of Democrats, the MacCorkles, Flemings, Chiltons and others those same papers have been roundly abusing as not true Democrats. They ought to find out whether Riley has changed his ways and does no longer belong to that class, which, they say, is so unsatisfactory to them.

T. S. Riley says he will not make a campaign for congress. Evidently, the Democrats begin to see their mistake, as Tom Hornor would have made a very vigorous one.
